British Military Defense Secretary Prince Regent Ernst Augustus King William IV Surrogate John Wanoa For: British Navy Military Financial Levy Debtors Recovery Interests in our Flag Trade Partner Record Chiefs ask you to fly a British Navy Admiral to represent Britain and Native Chiefs to NZ Navy Events

Dear John Key,

You are Forbidden from forcing US Financial Martial Law TPPA on New Zealand Land

We had the 28th October 2016 Celebrations of 182 Years since the British Navy Families arrived in Russell NZ on 20 March in 1834 This formed the basis of the first Native Title British "Crown" Corporations Sale and Purchase Agreement in a Private Contract of Admiralty between King William IV Reigning Monarch between Period 1830 and 1837 with the Moai Native Indigenie Chiefs Pre Sold British Crown Land over Native Chiefs Land at Kororareka Russell Bay of Islands. James Busby British Resident set up first British Government and Native Court with Chiefs chose an Appropriate Flag from 4 designs to use as a New Zealand Whakameninga Chiefs Whakaputanga Flag inside their British and Native Court from 20 March 1834 When Captain James Reddy Clendon HMS Fortitude bought the land as the first British "Crown" Land for British Navy families and other industrial workers. Captain George Lambert set off a 21 Gun Salute on his HMS Ship Alligator marking this day as the first British "Crown" King William IV HMS British UK Westminster Government Land Title Sale and Purchase Agreement from England with Indigenie Native Rangatira Chiefs. And from there the First Legal Legitimate British Navy Immigrants settled on the Kororareka Native Land they adopted as "RUSSELL" On 28 October 1835 James Busby British Resident Gazette d the Flag as the NSW New Zealand Government Declaration of Independence Day which had already been made a British UK Authority on 20.3.1834 adopted the chosen flag as New Zealand Flag

You are now holding these Documents I e-mailed a PDF to the British High Commission UK "Crown" Receipt of the Official Records in Wellington New Zealand from me as the Native Court Surrogate King William IV Sheriff for Paramount Chief Kingi Taurua and his Whakameninga Chiefs of the Northern Tribes Hapu. BOOM! Navy Petty Officer Joins DAPL Protest With Upside Down Flag

“Our Greatest Enemies Are Right Here” The Free Thought Project.com Claire Bernish November 6, 2016

U.S. Navy veteran, Petty Officer 1st Class Kash Jackson came to North Dakota with one imperative in mind to uphold the Constitution by protecting the American citizens he swore to defend, who are currently embroiled in a struggle with overly-militarized police acting on behalf of a twisted corporate-government alliance insisting on constructing the Dakota Access Pipeline.

Hoisting an inverted American flag as he led, in uniform, a group of Native American water protectors marching defiantly against government-backed industry profiteering, Jackson had a carefully-considered message about patriotic duty everyone must hear:

“Our greatest enemies are not overseas,” he told a reporter for The Young Turks, “our greatest enemies are right here.”

Indeed, images of police — better armed for combat in Syria or Iraq or Afghanistan than any of the thousands of servicemen and women in active combat — using brutal if nonlethal tactics against wholly unarmed Standing Rock Sioux water protectors and their supporters, have finally made the rounds on corporate media, much to the unsurprising consternation of the American public.

Jackson, however, couldn’t believe his eyes, and — as a former service member — saw an indispensable need to defend water protectors from the tyranny of a government run amok with power, acting solely to bolster corporate greed.

“Per the U.S. flag code,” the Navy veteran explains in the interview, “whenever you invert the American flag, it is permissible, underneath extreme risk to life and property — and based on what I’ve witnessed, over here in Standing Rock, I don’t think there’s any question whether or not there’s a risk to life and property.”

In short, the life and property of citizens are at risk based on the actions of State agents — various law enforcement and private, corporate-hired security mercenaries — and thus demand the protection of U.S. military personnel sworn to defend them.

As a veteran, Jackson is asked by The Young Turks reporter, “Have you ever seen, domestically, such force used against unarmed people, peaceful people, to protect an inanimate object [the Dakota Access Pipeline]?”

Obviously grasping the gravity of the situation unfolding in North Dakota, he replies,

“No, I’ve never witnessed this caliber of militarization against people — I mean, I’ve ... we’ve seen it throughout history, through the Civil Rights era, through Ferguson — there’s been multiple times in our nation’s history where we’ve utilized force like this against people ... who were peaceful. Most of which I saw during the Civil Rights Movement.”

Historians, advocates, and activists have, indeed, likened the multifaceted issues stemming from increasingly unscrupulous actions by law enforcement agencies untrained in the military surplus jackpot items the government willingly provides to a new era — a nascent, if circular moment — in the struggle for civil rights.

Ferguson, Missouri, and the tremendously controversial fatal shooting by Officer Darren Wilson of unarmed teen, Michael Brown — though decidedly not the first questionable police shooting of an unarmed person of color — abruptly snapped to public consciousness that something, indeed, has gone terribly awry in the United States.

More than two years hence, rather than sweeping reform of American policing, we stand amidst a widening epidemic of state-perpetrated violence against the public — and its parallel, nearly wholesale impunity from punishment.

Native Americans and Indigenous Peoples from well over 200 tribes and nations — from all over the globe — have an inherent and long-standing comprehension of that struggle, particularly as it plays out in Cannon Ball, North Dakota, in opposing yet another potentially dangerous oil pipeline.

As the reporter notes of intense and likely illegal surveillance efforts, in prefacing a question for Jackson, “it seems like the police can ... break laws, you know, freely, and there’s no consequences. They’re flying overhead without lights, they’re standing on Army Corps [of Engineers] land, they are standing on top of land [where] ancestors are buried, why do you think the police are doing this in such force?”

“Because we’ve allowed it in this country,” the Navy vet immediately responds, “and that’s why it’s occurring. The government and Big Business continues to exploit the citizens of this country, to exploit its resources ... and it’s because we, as citizens, have been apathetic to what’s going on all around us. We’re distracted by so many things occurring in this country that don’t mean anything. The World Series is super important — but what’s more important — a baseball, or people?”

“You know, people are more important. If we as a nation don’t stand together, united, then our government will continue to do what they’re doing here in Standing Rock.”

Beyond the militaristic, over-the-top crackdown on water protectors and activists at several encampments attempting to block the pipeline, the U.S. government has undertaken a considerable effort to ensure Dakota Access construction will continue unimpeded.

In addition to the appalling presence of police from at least five states, private security mercenaries, and federal agents, Energy Transfer Partners — the industry collective overseeing pipeline construction — and financially-motivated politicians have even re-written a decades-old ban on the export of unrefined crude to guarantee the surety of its completion.

Under this suffocating weight — and centuries of exploitation — opposition continues.

Asked if he considers the militarized force against unarmed water protectors — citizens — a battle against corporate profiteering, Jackson intoned,

“Whether or not it’s about greed, I don’t entirely know. What I do know, is what’s right in front of my face; and, whenever I see the military-style tactics utilized on peaceful people, that is a complete abridgement of First Amendment rights — the ability to express yourself freely without being ... I mean, I shouldn’t be intimidated or scared.

“You know, even for me to stand here the way that I do, in my uniform, people will frown upon that. I’ll be attacked personally for this. And ... it makes me concerned for what could happen. But, if I don’t ... I think Martin Luther King, Jr., had said it ... ‘an injustice anywhere, is a threat to justice everywhere.’ And this is an injustice. And I’m not going to stand by, as a retired servicemember, who swore to protect the Constitution and their rights, their constitutional rights — so, I’m here to continue to protect those for them, like I swore to do for twenty years.”

Further, the veteran expounds on the process of legislative debate happening behind “closed doors” as a means to exclude the public from the process, as if politicians and legislators indeed have plenty to hide.

“That’s what’s occurring in this country, is that ... Big Business is in bed with our government. There’s no secret about that. And the government profiting off of stealing and destroying our constitutional rights has to stop. And we, as American people, have to be willing. Standing Rock wasn’t necessarily my fight, so to speak; but what is my fight is that these are human beings — these are people — these are citizens of this country that I swore to protect.

“And I’m going to stand alongside of them and fight with them because I see what’s occurring here. Right before my eyes There’s no better way for me to know and understand what’s occurring here than to get in my truck and drive over here.”

As for President Obama’s continued virtual stonewalling, and refusal to take more than a tissue-thin stance about the militarized police response to peaceful civil disobedience the rest of the planet has the integrity to denounce, Jackson adds,

“... As a Commander-in-Chief of this country, he has a responsibility. He swore an oath for that Constitution the same as I did ... and too many people, veterans included, service members included, they have forgotten about that other piece” — the vow to defend against “all enemies, foreign and domestic, and we always point our eyes outward from our borders; but we never look inward.

The shame of the current and coming administrations is the willful blindness — the complicity — in ignoring and permitting paranoia about dissent to supplant the open debate and criticism of failed policy and legislation.

As we witness the failed fruits of rampant hegemony and imperialism, this military veteran’s words, and inverted flag distress signal, couldn’t be more crucial a reminder of what true patriotism — an actual defense of liberty — must entail.

Clendon family

James Reddy Clendon and 1) Mrs Sarah Isabella Clendon nee Hill, 2) Jane Cochrane, dau of Dennis Cochrane of Hokianga and his late wife, Takatowai Te Whata.

Arrived: 1832
Country of origin: England
Area in New Zealand: Bay of Islands
Source: book- The Bay of Islands, ENZB, Jack Lee; Wikipedia.

Details: James was a sea captain who visited New Zealand for the first time in 1828 as master of the 'City of Edinburgh'. He returned in 1830 and purchased Maori land at Okiato, a few miles south of Kororareka. He went back to England and purchased his own schooner 'Fortitude' and returned with his wife and children and business partner Samuel Stephenson, to develop the farm and establish a trading station in 1832. On 12 October 1838, Clendon was appointed the United States Consul in New Zealand. He was the owner of New Zealand's first bank which opened at Kororareka in September 1840.

A Personal Narrative of Two Visits to New Zealand in His Majesty's Ship, Alligator, A.D. 1834, by William Barrett Marshall 1836 Among other persons who took a passage across the bay in the Alligator, was a Mr. Clendon, a settler and ship-owner, who has adopted New Zealand for his country, and to whom I was entrusted with letters. He gave me a very kind and pressing invitation to his house, and expressed himself as in no small degree pleased at meeting with an officer afloat, avowedly interested in missionary operations and solicitous for the salvation of the heathen. Inquiry being made of Mr. C. as to his knowledge of the missionaries, their conduct and characters, he said, "But for them, Sir, no Europeans could live in the land! My own place has been frequently surrounded and my personal safety threatened by a host of armed natives; at such times I have only had to send a message to 'the settlement' (at Paihia) to procure the attendance of a missionary, who, upon his arrival, would speak to the principal chiefs, and by his mediation never failed to rid me of the invaders, they being ashamed to perpetrate an outrage in the presence of a missionary!"

After James died, his wife Jane was in the unhappy circumstance of paying off her husbands debts and bringing up the children. She was well educated, wrote fine letters, appealed to any who had in the past said she could appeal to. She was in the happy position of being respected by both Europeans and Maori who regarded her as their princess. When we were recently in the Hokianga, we visited Rawene and Clendon House, now looked after by the Historic Places Trust and we were most impressed by the information and stories we heard, it was a great experience being there. The narrator was a descendant of Jacky Love (Taranaki).
